Robert J. Blondin

Vice President, Learning Strategy
ACS Learning Services

Bob Blondin serves as our Chief Learning Strategist for our Learning Services business.

Prior to ACS, he was a partner at Ernst & Young for 10 years, where he provided strategic learning services to the firm's global affiliates, as well as to government organizations and a variety of Fortune 500 clients in the retail, consumer products, financial services, pharmaceutical, energy, manufacturing and high-tech sectors.

With 35 years in the learning services industry, Blondin has significant expertise working at the executive level to align business goals with learning strategies.

Blondin holds a B.A. in mathematics from St. Michael's College in Vermont and an M.S. in mathematics from the University of Notre Dame.

Learning and Development Strategy

Blondin provides strategic consulting services on how to address business trends and workplace challenges through strategic learning; performance, expertise and talent management; and knowledge capture and transference.

He has helped companies transform their workforce through the development of global learning strategy architectures. By assembling people, processes, technology, measurement strategies and learning content, companies can ensure that their human resource services and learning strategies are aligned to business goals and defined business outcomes. These strategies involve identification of performance and knowledge gaps, recommendations for new learning curriculum and recommendations for the learning governance environment.

Thought leadership has been an ACS hallmark since we began performing outsourcing services in 1988. Our subject matter experts are available to discuss the latest trends and help you make more-informed business decisions.
